'Jefferson Most Vital'—Hahn

By Jim Aiken

Thomas Jefferson was "the most vital and suggestive thinker of his time," said Dr. Lewis Hahn dean of the Washington University graduate school, in his lecture "Jefferson and Revolution" Thursday night in Woody Hall's formal lounge.

Dr. Hahn was third in a series of four lectures on "Writers and Revolution." Two earlier lectures dealt with Martin Luther and the English romantic poets.

Jefferson's natural rights philosophy was not original, but can be found in the writings of John Locke, said Dr. Hahn. "However, Jefferson was not a speculative philosopher; he had practical wisdom for practical affairs."

Dr. Hahn outlined Jefferson's work between 1773-76 and how it culminated in his authorship of the Declaration of Independence.

Some of Jefferson's ideas on Revolution expressed in the Declaration of Independence and in his letters were analyzed after the reading of excerpts from his writings.

"Jefferson contributed as much to social revolution as he did to the American Revolution," said Dr. Hahn in referring to Jefferson's ideas on government, education and human rights.

"He had faith in human nature and believed in a natural aristocracy of talent rather than one of wealth or position.

He felt the individual man was of supreme worth."

Dr. Hahn spoke of Jefferson's work in land reform, education and the freeing of slaves in Virginia. "He wanted the destruction of land privilege and the removal of feudal distinctions."

A quotation from Abraham Lincoln ended Dr. Hahn's lecture: "The principles and axioms of Thomas Jefferson are the foundations of democracy."

Listeners and Dr. Hahn discussed some of the contradictions in Jefferson and his writings after the lecture.

"The last lecture in the series, of 'Kosster and Communism' will be given by Dr. W. E. Simone of the English Department at 7:30 p. m., April 13 in the Woody Hall formal lounge.

Insurance Job Keeps Speaker On The Go, But He Likes It

"It's quite a job to supervise insurance agencies scattered over the entire Eastern half of the United States and it keeps me on the go, but I like it," Eugene V. Boisubin said in an interview after his speech at the Freshman Convocation Thursday.

"My main purpose here was to explain how our insurance policies can through their flexibility, be the answer to the economic problems of any individual and his family."

Boisubin, who has been with the American Life Insurance Company since 1941 except for five years in the Navy, says there is a tremendous career for young men in the life insurance business.

Boisubin began his career as supervisor of a single accident and sickness insurance agency and is now supervisor of all agencies east of the Mississippi River and those in Missouri and Iowa.

The Life Insurance business is now a profession and our policies have been modified so that the policy-holders don't have to die to win," he said.
