Long lines of children snaked through the SIUC campus Tuesday during the Arts and Education Festival. Area first through fifth graders participated in art and cultural activities around campus, including attending a ballet performance in the Student Center and a symphony in Shryock Auditorium.

Fourth-graders at Carruthers Elementary School in Murphysboro only have art class once a week for about an hour.

So students in Donna Pugh's class finished spending part of Tuesday afternoon in the Student Center, weaving designs into burlap clothes. The students were among the nearly 2,000 first through fifth-graders that packed the Student Center, University Museum, Shryock Auditorium and other campus venues for the 16th annual Arts Education Festival.

The two-day event draws about 3,500 children to campus to release pent up creative energy while exploring different facets of the arts and other cultures. Each class had an opportunity to attend three programs which included ballet, story telling and a taste of art and craft projects.

Pansy Jones, co-chair of the event, receives phone calls from art elementary school teachers year-round inquiring about when the event will be. The teachers and students anticipate the festival each year because it gives them a chance to abandon their usual curriculum and focus more on art and culture.

"The purpose is to give these youngsters a taste of the performing and visual arts," said Jones, who has helped organize the event for the past 15 years. "Most of our elementary schools now are really lacking in the arts experience and hopefully our arts festival here at SIUC helps to fill that void."

The campus looked like a playground Tuesday and is expected to again today as hur-derds of children skipped around campus or followed their classes in single-file lines. Third-graders sporting Powerpuff Girls and Scooby Doo backpacks marched from Patton Hall to the Old Baptist Foundation Tuesday to hear stories with rope while recounting Native-American stories. And fifth-graders ran around outside Morris Library playing a makeshift game of tag called "Go Nuts" before walking over to Shryock Auditorium for a dance presentation.

A Carbondale bouncer has been missing since early Sunday morning after going out with friends to celebrate his birthday.

William Anthony Cole, 25, of Hinsdale, was last seen leaving Carboz, 760 E. Grand Ave., at 12:30 a.m. Sunday with a white female with blonde hair and red highlights, Lisa Lindveit, Cole's friend said. He was not working at the time.

Several people concerned about the circumstances of Cole's disappearance have filed missing person police reports with investigations from the Carbondale Police Department.

Cole is described as 6-foot-1-inch, 185 pounds with a Chinese inscription tattooed on his upper right arm and a black panther tattooed on his right pec-toral muscle. He was last seen wearing khaki pants, a navy shirt with a yellow vertical stripe and black combat boots. Roommates William and Jodyn Hamby contend Cole is an SIUC student, but data from admissions and Spring 2000 records show Cole has been missing from here to St. Louis, Hamby said. "If he had, we certainly wouldn't be filing police reports," Snuckman said. "It's not like him at all."

The female seen leaving with Cole is a mystery to Cole's roommates and co-workers, none of whom said they knew her.

"Somebody has to know who she is," Hamby said. "How often do you go to the bar past 1 a.m."

Hamby said Cole's mother is traveling to Carbondale today to speak with police and look for her son. Police Chief R.T. Fainey said police are looking into Cole's disappearance, but there is not much for them to work with.

"We put the information out through the region," Fainey said. "Until some more information comes up, there's not a whole lot we have to go on."

Mysteries oak disease may threaten nation's forests

Sara Francisco — On the rolling hills and low mountains of coastal Northern California, green and lush now after winter rains live oaks, tan- oaks, and madrones have been dying for more than two years. A mysterious microbe that causes the leaf drop has been found on a waning list of trees. Even the stately redwood, a California icon as well as a valuable timber product, may be vulnerable. Scientists tracking the spreading disease is giving currency among plant pathologists and federal regulators that the disease is not only spreading throughout California and infect the forests of the interior United States with potentially disastrous results.

Iraq oil embargo will not affect U.S. gas prices

Experts say any decision Monday to place an embargo on oil exports from the United States and Europe should have little effect on gasoline prices, which continue to climb up. President Dwight D. Eisenhower announced an embargo of crude-oil exports for 16 days in June 1959 to force extraction of oil from the Middle East to curb U.S. prices, but it had little effect.

Philippines provides 70 percent of marijuana supply

At the time, only 10 percent of marijuana exported by the Philippines was processed domestic crop. The Philippines remains the world's largest producer of marijuana.

Missing Carbondale girl found

Daily Egyptian

A 13-year-old Carbondale girl who was reported missing earlier this week was found early Tuesday morning at Memorial Hospital of Carbondale.

Police said Shirley Wiley was having an asthma attack when she was dropped off at Memorial Hospital of Carbondale at 2:30 a.m. Tuesday by an unknown female.

Wiley told police she had been in several locations in the two days since her disappearance but would not specify where. Police said they do not suspect foul play in her disappearance.

Police said the hospital called about Wiley because she is a minor. Police notified her guardians and the Center for Comprehensive Services that she had been found.

The center sent a staff member to pick up Wiley at the hospital after she was identified by police. Wiley is a patient at the facility and is being treated with medication.

Former Saluki dawg mascot runs for Board of Trustees

Alexa Aguilar

Daily Egyptian

Editor's note The other candidate for student trustee, Bill Archer, will be featured in Thursday's edition.

Ted Clark spent many of his undergraduate days sweating inside a grey furry suit as the Saluki mascot. Now, he wants to don a more professional suit and tweak his dapper dog ear for the chance to be the student voice in the USG Board of Trustees.

Clark, a first-year medical student, is running to be the SIUC student trustee to the seven-member Board of Trustees. The board is the major decision-making body for the SIU system, and both the Edwardsville and Carbondale campuses have a student member. While the regular members are appointed by the governor, the student members are selected in campus-wide elections.

In addition to being the Saluki mascot, Clark has been involved in Undergraduate Student Government and served on different campus-wide committees. He has also made him a great candidate for the trustee position.

"I see the trustee position as a way for a student to act as a conduit to coordinate all the different student councils and programs across the campus," Clark said.

It won't be known until after the election, however, if the SIUC trustee's voice will get a binding vote. Each year, the governor grants either the SIU-Edwardsville or SIUC student trustee a binding vote. The vote is not chosen during the year for the position.

Last year, Gov. George Ryan gave the binding vote to the SIUC trustee. Though Clark said he would not do so unless he could get the binding vote, he's ready to serve without it.

"Losing the vote doesn't mean that the trustee can't bring student opinions to the board," Clark said.

Clark will face former USG President Bill Archer in the election. He is running as the candidate for the Edwardsville campus.

Clark's new location could be perceived as a drawback. SIU's medical school is in Springfield, so he will be living in Springfield next year. He's not concerned, though, that his absence from campus will have a negative effect on his ability to represent students.

"I see the trustee position as a way for a student to act as a conduit to coordinate all the different student councils and programs across the campus," Clark said.

Clark said he will make visits to SIUC twice a month, and keep phone and e-mail contact with all the council presidents on campus.

"I don't think that after going to school here for four years, that one year is going to make me lose touch with the students," Clark said.

Clark said he is determined to use the lessons he learned from his involvement in USG. He was defeated twice in a USG presidential election, and both times were marked by controversy.

In 1999, Clark heard that some students were voting twice, and he said he decided to check out the rumor by voting twice himself. Then, in last year's election, there was a deadlock when his-party did not turn in lists of campaign expenditures. Clark said he would make sure instances can be attributed to miscommunication and poor judgment.

He said he's glad to move on from USG and thinks the student trustee position will be a good fit.

"I see the trustee position as a two-way street," Clark said. "I bring information to the board of trustees, but I think I can make a better job of bringing information from the board back to the students."

An example of how much the board's action can affect students is a proposed double-billage increase that the Board of Trustees will vote on before the end of the school year.

"If he were the trustee, Clark won't be a part of the board in time to influence the decision, but he will still offer his opinions about a possible tuition hike."

"He's not opposed to the idea of increased tuition, he doesn't think it fair to charge the right fee because of all the different courses we offer."

"It's pretty stressful, I only do it here because I love this place so much."

Elections for student trustee will be April 16 and 17.

No political action is too big or small, says Sheila Simon
Professor Simon discusses women's role in politics at Interfaith Center

Samantha Edmondson
Daily Egyptian

After campingg for her father, former Sen. Paul Simon, Sheila Simon shadowed his campaign day by day while wearing her bicycle helmet.

Simon rode her bike to the Fair Trade Coffee House at the Interfaith Center Tuesday evening, where she gave a lecture on women’s roles in politics and domestic violence.

“Sheila Simon speaks to students on domestic violence and taking a stand to help one another. Simon specifically targets the need for action in our society and emphasizes women’s role in politics by highlighting her mother as a political role model for all women.”

Old Navy to set sail at U. Malt

The U. Old Navy marque is visible from Route 13. There are so clothes on the racks yet, in fact, of February and a couple of students, but the opening is slated for sometime in early March; may, though no official date has been set.

Debra Tindall, manager, University Center, said that the demolition of the space took the entire month of January.

“it was a complete remodel,” Tindall said. “It was a gutted top.

The space she is referring to is the site of the old Walgreens and J. C. Penney. Old Navy will encompass more than 16,000 square feet, making it the largest in the mall. In the mall, not counting the anchor stores like Hooters and the demolition of the University Mall, which is visible from Route 13. There are families that come in here all the time for food, to sea food to burgers and chicken wings, and there’s not a really good place to go to try something a little different.

“He’s been a real good person to say you shouldn’t get anywhere because you don’t have political muscle.”

But she added there are women on the ballot who have worked their way into the political spectrum without a connection to a political family.

Simon said she enjoys talking with people who show they are passionate about a cause. The group at the Fair Trade Coffee House is involved in all issues, including women’s issues, political and domestic violence. At the former coordinator for the Domestic Violence Clinic, a service providing legal counsel for victims of domestic violence, Simon is adamant about building a society that tries to confront abuses and support victims.

“Working at the Domestic Violence Clinic, I constantly worked with victims of domestic violence. Right now, when you are in college, run into someone who is a victim of domestic violence and they are probably trying to hide it in some way,” Simon said. “Those people see the area that need support the most.”

Simon also said attending events such as a protest against the war in Afghanistan in Washington, D.C., April 20 is a important way for students to support their political causes.

“Getting yourself involved with something you feel really passionate about is good start,” Simon said. “If something is important to you, you will do all sorts of directions.”

“Realizing and highlighting gender equity, women’s issues and political and economic justice.

“Politics is still dominated by men, we still need more women in politics. How do we get more women into politics? One way is through role models.”

Sheila Simon, a professor in the School of Law, who teaches basic legal writing, related her political beliefs to a group of 15 at the Interfaith Center through her personal experiences growing up and from others in and outside the political scales.

COBA professors pocket the world wide web

Business students research portable web access effects

Ben Botkin
Daily Egyptian

A commuter in the near future riding the subway home whips out a pocket-size computer and logs onto the Internet. First, he checks the stock prices and then his e-mail. Then, he realizes he forgot that today is his anniversary. He needs to panic, since he can view full-color photos of flowers at a nearby store and order a bouquet to be delivered to his wife while on his way home. And he can also log onto the local candy store's website and order his wife's favorite kind of chocolates.

Wireless Internet access and the changes it will bring to the commercial world are the subjects of research being completed by two SIUC professors in the College of Business and Administration. Anand Kumar and George Bruner, two marketing professors, are reviewing data from a project that involved input from students in Kumar's marketing class.

Their research used new PDA (personal digital assistant) computers, which are palm-size units that hook up to the Internet via a wireless connection provided by a network in Rahn Hall. Only a wireless network can provide the PDA computers, paid for with student fees, with Internet access, the professors said.

Because the technology is the latest, they want the research to examine what the Internet will bring next to the world of commerce and consumer behavior. In the near future, airports and hotels will add wireless Internet access to their list of benefits when advertising for customers, Bruner said.

"This is looking down the road to what's going to be available in the future," he said. "It is on the cutting edge of what's available."

Although people already have wireless Internet access with cell phones, the text-only format limits consumer use of portable Internet access, according to Bruner. The PDAs are clearer and have graphics not accessible with a cell phone.

The marketing students were given assignments such as looking up information about movie times at local theaters. Some students used cell phone technology simulated on a desktop computer. Others had lap-tops, and a third group was supplied with the PDA units.

Through the project, the professors hope to gain insight into what types of technology consumers will prefer in the near future of widespread wireless access.

"We're interested in how consumers behave when they can take the web with you," Bruner said.

Because the technology is not widespread yet, the professors hope the research will show how people will use portable Internet access in the future.

"What we're studying is done as if this were to happen for real," Kumar said.

Although PDA computers have more graphics, cell phones and other technology will still suffice when looking up movie times or checking e-mail, Bruner said. But with making online purchases of clothing, for example, the technology would be more beneficial, he added.

Kumar said the research will also help students gain hands-on experience in using the latest technology.

"This is one of the ways in which students would be able to use this technology before they enter the work force," he said.

Students said they enjoyed getting a taste of what the future of computers will bring.

"I'm always joking with my husband about how I could do more with one," said Jasmine Winters, a junior in marketing from Evansville, Ind.

Nick Stone, a junior in business administration from Belleville, said he enjoyed using the PDA units to look up information. He said that although his budget doesn't allow for a PDA, the experience will give him insights.

Both professors also plan to help students use wireless technology to evaluate websites in a class this semester. They will work with about 30 students in an MBA class taught by Mayron King, an associate professor of marketing.

King said she is glad to see her class be able to get practical experience with the technology and see how different websites fit into the technology.

"I do all hands-on in this class," she said.

Bruner stressed that the PDA computers extend beyond the business world to people from many walks of life.

"It's a brave, new world when people can take this web with them wherever they go," he said.

Tuition hike necessary for SIU, but a potential financial heartache for international students

International students are an important part of SIU. They not only provide good role models as hard-working students, but they enrich our campus and community with their cultures and outlook. Their role at SIU is vital part of who we are as a University, as we are all students, faculty and staff. But the consequences of the proposed tuition increase on international students has been grossly overlooked. As administrators look to raise tuition for the benefit of the University in the future, we must be alert to the far that it will uniquely affect international students in ways that it won’t American students.

In our support of the tuition hike, we noted how the increase will generate the necessary funds the University could use during the next four years — about $8 million from a 18 percent increase in 2003. International students pay more than $250 per credit hour as non-Illinois residential students, compared to $79.72 per credit hour for Illinois residents. That is also the same for non-resident students who are not international students. But international students have additional financial hurdles that American students do not. Spouses, for example, are not eligible for health insurance if they are not students. Thus they must pay for medical expenses out of their own pockets. Their mates, however, are eligible if they are students.

Applying for credit cards is another difficult task because many foreign-born citizens lack a credit history.

True, American students also face problems. But the mechanisms in place that assist American students are vastly more extensive and in place for international students. America is indeed the land of opportunity, and we work to make our country as fair as can be for all who reside here. But sometimes we fall short in ways that it won’t American students.

Tuition opponents have argued that the increase is unfair to middle-class and lower-income students. But as was pointed out in the March 31 "Our Word," lower-income students' financial aid would offset the tuition increase. And as suggested earlier, we recognize the contribution all students make to our campus, including those from middle-class backgrounds. The increase will not affect all middle-class students the same way, but we recognize that it will have some effect.

We also challenged students to accept the necessary burden that reform will have to be made in order to steer our University out of these troubled financial waters. International students are sure to accept that responsibility as well if need be. Still, universities and institutions of higher education cannot expect a tuition hike to have a similar impact on international students as it might in American students. Remember, it was mostly American students who were negatively impacted by the application fee imposed last fall. The University sought to correct this problem through waivers for lower-income applicants.

We urge Chancellor Wendler, other administrators and the University as a whole to show the same wisdom and insight concerning this issue. It is the fair and insightful thing to do.

The following editorial appeared in the Dallas Morning News on Monday, April 8.

(KRT) — Move on about this could change the nature of farming in the United States. If realized, they would help to turn U.S. farmers into producers of not just food and fiber but of clean, renewable energy.

That would be a good thing. Farmers always need to diversify their sources of income. If a farmer can earn money by raising cattle and by selling methane gas from manure to electrical utilities, all the better for him; for the nation’s security; for rural economies; and for the environment, which suffers from the country’s addiction to fossil fuels.

May farmers already are energy producers. They sell their methane gas or install electricity-generating wind turbines on their property, or raise biomass crops that can be turned into energy. However, the transition would be helped considerably by a little encouragement from Uncle Sam.

The Senate took a major step in that regard in February when it passed a farm bill that would spend $70 million during five years to stimulate energy production on U.S. farms. The bill would provide grants and loans to encourage farmers to invest in wind, biomass and related energies. It would fund research into innovative ways to trap and sequester carbon dioxide (the principal greenhouse gas implicated in Earth’s unnatural warming) in soil and plant matter. It would provide grants for finding ways to power farm machinery with hydrogen fuel cells, whose only byproduct is water.

The House also has passed a farm bill. But its bill contains no such provisions. That’s why it is crucially important that the conference committee that has the task of reconciling the competing versions retain the Senate’s good work. There isn’t much time. The committee could finish by early this week. The committee’s Texas members, Democratic Rep. Charles Stenholm and Republican Rep. Larry Combest, should advance the economic and environmental interests of their state and country by ensuring that the final version retains the Senate’s energy provisions.

In older times, tobacco and sugar were leading cash crops. Today, energy is. Congress needs to grasp the change and act on it.

In the relationship between security and prosperity, race becomes a coded non-verbal. A term always assumed to be present in the conversation of Kaufman’s critique of its signification. Throughout the world, countries are preparing for the aftermath of the national orientation of the United States against their sovereignty. The Bush administration has constructed a new Middle East policy providing Iran, Iraq and other Middle Eastern countries with alternative communication to Israel and ultimately the United States.

Kaufman, Alaska oil drilling now becomes a plausible alternative, human.

Domestically, issues of health care and threats on civil liberties because of the Sept. 11 retaliation for U.S. imperialism still haunt the construction of the student center. We all know the effects of "progress" in the increase of tuition at Southern Illinois University at Carbondale.

Do what these things do to have each other, you ask. It is simple. They’re all ways in which we have domesticated the difference of marginalized and naturalized.

Do we really think that Chancellor Weidler’s proposal will not affect the creation of students at SIUC? Are we really that naive?

It is not until we realize the evolution of American society that we can better understand the relationship of these students at the various centers in Carbondale, what do we see? We have noticed African, African that fit criminal profiling, African student organizations that are disorganized and minorities running rampant.

Do we really think that tuition increases will give us a "better education" or a "better type of student"? Of course, we mean to say the upper-middle-class type of student who better fits the image of improved image of SIUC - the image that despises the murder of Marcus Thompson, something we should have been here. Weidler's proposal not only limits diversity, but makes a conscious effort to destroy ethnic representation. It is not a coincidence that racism lives on; if the social structure did not support the ideas, then the people that committed the murders would not live on. Just as Joseph Johnson, who "loves terrorists" for their convictions, will not be chilling on Capitol Hill, and soon, society knows it no longer be the heard. The issue at hand now is whether we say what we said, or do we just keep up with the status quo. At some point, we have to realize the consequences of international policy, domestic politics, and the racism.

The issue is white nationalization, the only difference is that Africans are given a choice this time of whether they would like to sign on to the agenda. Bush's move to increase the threat and return to a time of America, we should only expect fear and caution. We all know that in a racialized society like America we will always be all black and white, or start a war.

Dear Editor:

I know many people will not open this, but I have no choice but to say how I feel about the total lack of response I have received from any SIU official. I am writing again to bring attention to the treatment of African American students at SIUC.

My name appears on Wednesday, Tommy's a senior at SIUC.

In the beginning of the semester, I scoffed that my friend probably didn't even have the five seconds necessary to detect the subtle differences in bouquet and flavor if she didn't know what color the flowers had put in her bouquet. I challenged him to a limited taste test to prove he was qualified to debate me on this subject.

Christ: Can't. I gave up junk food for Lent.

Grace: I thought you weren't supposed to talk any junk you give up.

Chris: No, I'm on a diet. I think you're thinking of another denomination.

Grace: How come it's all right for some people, but not others?

Chris: Heck if I know. That's just the way it is.

My Nommo appears on Wednesday, Tommy's a senior at SIUC.

Protest Tuition Hike: SIUC Campus

Green Party member and USG Senator Joel Landry adds another signed letter opposing the proposed tuition increase to a growing pile outside of Faner Hall on Tuesday. Chancellor Walter Wendler proposed to raise tuition by 49 percent during the next four years. The letters will be sent to the Board of Trustees before it votes on increases at its May meeting.

13 Israeli soldiers killed in Jenin as Israel vows to root out terrorists

Soraya Sarhaddi Nelson Knight Ridder Newspapers

JERUSALEM - Israel aired international calls for a fast withdrawal of its troops from the West Bank on Tuesday as 13 Israeli soldiers died in Jenin after setting off the explosives that brought down a building in a refugee camp. "A state of Israel," said Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a television broadcast, "is being defended by 13 Israeli soldiers who were killed today by a suicide bomber, yes, as they were entering a refugee camp." "The world has today witnessed a terrible event," Sharon said. "We will pursue all those who plan such acts and who commit such acts." The killing of the soldiers, in Jenin, brought the toll of Israeli military casualties to 28 since Israel began its offensive on March 28. In Jenin, Israel's annual commemoration of the 6 million Jewish Holocaust victims, the Israeli army was refusing to make an official statement about the deaths. In the West Bank, thousands of Palestinians took to the streets of Nablus, Jenin and Hebron to protest the military operations. Israeli leaders were increasingly intransigent about leaving the West Bank, nominally a Palestinian-controlled area, insisting they will finish their quest to root out terrorism despite growing opposition to the military offensive in the world community. "This is a battle for the survival of the Jewish people, for the survival of the state of Israel," said Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a television broadcast. The Jenin refugee camp has been the site of the heaviest fighting during the Israeli incursions that began on March 29. "The refugees had no water in the camp. The injuries that became sick after drinking sewage water," Abu Estikh said. "Mothers fell when they were trapped in the rubble by a large explosion. As the surrounding buildings collapsed, Palestinian snipers opened fire on the wounded soldiers, finishing them off," Kiri said. Palestinians quickly dragged the bodies of those soldiers to a nearby building, which fell down on top of them. Palestinian officials, however, said the Israeli soldiers died accidentally after setting off the explosives themselves. There was no independent confirmation of either account. Israeli forces have not suffered so many casualties in a single day since 1997. Among the 25 Israeli soldiers and at least 100 Palestinians have been killed since Israeli forces entered Jenin a week ago, according to the Israeli military. Dr. Mahmoud Abu Estikh of Al-Razi hospital in the town of Jenin said the number of Palestinian casualties was higher. "We were able to identify the wounded and the dead," he said. "The refugees had no water and food, he added. "We have been treating about 30 people, including children, who became sick after drinking sewage water," Abu Estikh said. "Mordeh were mixing (formula) with sewage water to give their infants."

The recent lack of diamond diversity leaves coaches and fans wondering why minorities are.

MISSING IN ACTION

Story by Jay Schwab

Looking around the diamond during a college baseball game, you might as well be catching a glossy film from the 1950s.
The fans in the dugout are white. The fans in the stands are white. The fans of the Sooners are white.

If you're into diversity, look elsewhere.

Salukis baseball head coach Dan Callahan's team has one black player on its 24-man roster, and astonishingly, the Salukis are not an exception.
Black players in college baseball are virtually non-eistant, and the reasons for that may be too multi-faceted to counter any time soon.

Callahan only had to think back a few weeks to recall a pair of four-team tournaments that extremely the snow-white look of college baseball.

"It's a lot cooler to make it to a big time, plus, baseball can be prohibitively expensive for some black who come from impoverished families.

"And the need to get into the pickup bas ketball game than it is a baseball game," Callahan said. "It's a lot less expensive, A cheap glove and a cheep bat are not cheap, and you can buy a bas ketball for $10."

Masten has been saddened by the deaths of black in college baseball, which he says has been the case throughout his decade of involvement in the sport. But, Masten said he's found something in baseball.

"When we coached in New Orleans, Masten stressed the need for diversity in teams," Callahan said. "I'm not saying we're the only place in college baseball, but there are fewer of us than there should be."

The small pool of black college players might not be surprising given a lack of participation at earlier ages. Drive around urban areas and you'll likely see a desolate diamond that looks like it hasn't been used in years.

But in baseball-mad St. Louis, Charles tyson said there's been a sense of injustice in Sheriff's Office's youth baseball programs that brought them to campus for batting camp, and he said more of those types of special efforts are needed in greater numbers.

"I think we've got to do a better job of mak ing baseball fun for kids," Masten said. "Kids love it more than they used to. What we've got to do is get more kids out to the playground in day, but today they don't have to come out and disappear. So it's a real challenge for a coach to make it more fun for kids.

The college coaches bring black athletes into their programs is a benefit of a challenge. Many of the elite black prospects from high school sign professional contracts, and in Callahan's experience, most of the others haven't been receptive to his overtures.

"The only black member on the Salukis — Mills — would've been round if he hadn't failed the SIU basketball teams during an injury-plagued junior season.

Mills grew up in a primarily black area in Memphis, but while most of his peers continued his father's tradition of baseball and his impulse to play.

"You somehow get into college baseball that was a big thing," Mills said. "Hopefully we've been getting more diversity playing baseball as opposed to football for that.

"It's a lot cooler to make it to career baseball, his father's interest in the sport spurred his impulse to play. He settled in basketball in high school, and he wishes that more black athletes would look to the short-career college baseball, but was

"It's a lot cooler to make it to Barry Bonds celebrates his 70th home run this season. In recent years, the number of minorities in college baseball has declined.

And there's been a big resurgence.

"Whether that translates into more diversity in college baseball remains to be seen. For now, the sport that has historically sought America's turned to something else. The youth sports teams are expanded, and the youth sports programs have continued to showcase few black athletes at the college level.

And in Masten's mind, the sport is suffering
as a result.

"Baseball is missing some great athletes," he said. "Who lost those to the sports of football and basketball. College baseball would be much stronger if we could find a way to capture some of those athletes."

Sky diving and bungee jumping are considered death-defying activities. But pole vaulting—

According to the National Center for Catastrophic Sport Injury Research at the University of North Carolina, from 1981 to 2000 there was one death each year from pole vaulting-related injuries. In less than two months, three vaulters lost their lives due to head trauma suffered during practice or competition. The most talked about was Penn State athlete Kevin Dare. The other two were high school students—James Quade of Chesterfield, Fla., and Samos Fll II of Wichita, Kan.

Ed Dare, Kevin’s father, has been vocal about the dangers of pole vaulting and renewed about 10 minutes into the effort to stop up his son and “we need specific recommendations for vaulting.”

“We need to go through the same level of certification for safe education,” Dare said. They have to pass a test on general safety rules, equipment, and know about the adequate victim-avoiding the vaulting area.”

The certification that coaches have to take is not only for their own education, but also to ensure the athletes that are being trained by these coaches know and understand the proper techniques for the event.

Mandating helmets for vaulting is an issue that has been discussed many times before, but hasn’t come to the forefront of the sport until now.

“Is there a way to protect the athletes?” Wright said. “If [a helmet] can save a kid’s life and not restrict the athlete, then why not.”

Men’s team places 10th in Branson

The SIU men’s golf team placed 10th out of 13 teams at Monday and Tuesday’s NCAA Regional Championship in Branson, Mo., finishing 33 strokes behind tournament winner Nebraska.

Brad Dunker shot a combined 221, leading the Salukis and good enough for 9th place in the individual standings.

“I think he’s done some outstanding work,” Penske said. “I think he found out how important football was for him.”

“I think he’s had a great season,” Brad said. “He’s had a great season. I think he thought about it and realized that football was important to him.”

Now that he’s back, McAllister is taking full advantage.

At Monday’s practice, McAllister and plaster remade about 30 minutes after the loss of his team had cleared out and just put up the field playing a game.

Once they finished, McAllister cracked his grin and a life-filled phrase

Freshmen have become a dynamic part of the Saluki pitching team

Their average age is only 19, but they are performing like seasoned veterans. They are three young pitchers who have bolstered a once-floundering pitching staff and have kept the SIU baseball team in the thick of the Missouri Valley Conference race.

They are Eric Haberer, Ryan Welch and Andrew Weber, and they are three freshmen who have helped the Salukis become the third-best pitching team in the always-pitching-rich MVC.

Not only have the three men performed well as of late, they have done so while SIU’s top three pitching aces have struggled with injuries and poor starts. Three weeks ago sophomore Jerel DeVincent went down with a bone spur in his knee during the Missouri Valley Conference, while junior Jake Nelson has had strained appearances the past two weeks. For younger pitchers, however, has picked up the slack and kept the Salukis heads above water.

"I would have never convinced me two weeks ago that we'd be 4-0 with a sophomore and freshmen pitching and 6-4 with Alley and Nelson pitching," head coach Dan Callahan said.

Coming into the fall, Callahan was unsure of how well his young pitchers would perform this season. He quickly realized, however, that they would provide immediate help when he saw the two young pitchers who had been with the program for several years.

Haberer (2-0), Weber (0-1) and Welch (3-1) have amassed five wins and two saves among the three of them and are the top three pitchers on the Salukis in terms of earned run average.

Haberer, a southpaw from Bloomington, was the first to establish himself. He pitched an inning of one-hit ball in SIU’s first game of the season and continued to progress from there.

In 21 innings of work, Haberer has only allowed four earned runs for a 1.57 ERA and has become the Saluki ace in the bullpen. Callahan said Haberer has shown the strength and durability to be the team’s No. 1 closer.

"It’s a great honor to be relied upon to close out the games we’re winning," Haberer said. "I really don’t think it’s coming, but I’m really happy I am the closer.

Weber had a less auspicious start to his college career, blowing a lead in his first relief appearance and winding up with the loss. Weber only gave up a grand slam to the first batter he faced and eventually bunted another batter to allow the winning run to score in the final game of SIU’s series at University of Louisiana-Monroe.

"It was then that Callahan started to believe Haberer’s potential and decided to give him the ball the rest of the week.

"Weber is unique in the fact that he’s from Midlothian, just brushed it off and prepared for the next game, something his coach sees as a perfect example of his unflappable personality: "Weber is unique in the fact that he’s from Midlothian and is able to keep his cool," Callahan said. "He’s kinda a free spirit, he doesn’t seem to be bothered by a whole lot and I admire him for that."

Welch’s role came when SIU men’s basketball head coach Bruce Weber told the crowd at the Salukis’ preseason banquet Tuesday night that he intends to be back with the team next season.

"He’s the opportunity to utilize McAllister’s talents for another season thanks to a successful appeal for a fifth year of eligibility for the penultimate senior from Ottawa, Ill.," Weber said. "I told Dan that we’re going to have him back and that he’s going to be our top pitcher."

"It was a kind of lie if I get one, kind of lie if I get one, kind of lie if I get one, kind of lie if I get one," McAllister said. "But if I can go through the rest of the season kind of not knowing it was in the air and stuff, but it’s not going to affect me."

Saluki tight end returns for fifth year

Ryan McAllister was off to an ideal senior campaign. Through the first couple of games of the 2001 season, the Saluki senior tight end had five catches for 77 yards with a 15.4-yard per catch average. It was then that all the fun came to a painful end.

McAllister strained the medial collateral ligament in his knee during the third game against Western Illinois and was lost for the year.

The loss of McAllister turned a position which had been one of the Salukis’ strengths to one that virtually vanished for the remainder of SIU’s 1-10 season.

"McAllister and fellow tight end Blad Bush had been seeing to give SIU head coach Jerry Kill the two legitimate tight ends he craves for his offense," Kill said. "He told me of his potential "all-around tight end" made the Salukis change the things they tried to do differently.

"It killed us when we lost Ryan McAllister to injury last year," Kill said. "It was a big blow to our offense because we like utilizing those young men and just writing about our coaching staff."

The right-hander from Midlothian, however, just brushed it off and prepared for the next game, something his coach sees as a perfect example of his unflappable personality: "Weber is unique in the fact that he’s from Midlothian and is able to keep his cool," Callahan said. "He’s kinda a free spirit, he doesn’t seem to be bothered by a whole lot and I admire him for that."

Welch’s role came when SIU men’s basketball head coach Bruce Weber told the crowd at the Salukis’ preseason banquet Tuesday night that he intends to be back with the team next season.

"The coach told a couple of us that, "if we pitched up to our potential, then we definitely had a chance at either being in the starting rotation or at least getting some quality innings," Welch said.

Weber’s staying here

Jay Schwab

SIU men’s basketball head coach Bruce Weber told the crowd at the Salukis’ preseason banquet Tuesday night that he intends to be back with the team next season.

At the end of the banquet, Weber stated that he had a recent conversation with Saint Louis University Athletic Director Doug Woolard about scheduling, and Woolard informally referenced the Eagles’ coaching vacancy.

Weber said that he told Woolard that he was happy in Carbondale and excited about the team he has returning, drawing a loud reaction from the 500 people in attendance.

That should put to rest the speculation in the St. Louis media that Weber would be pursued as a candidate for the St. Louis job afterLorem Romar left to take the position at Washington.

Weber was previously pulled out of consideration in the West Virginia coaching search, it is expected to be given a contract extension by SIU in the near future after leading the Salukis to the Sweet Sixteen this year.
