Let Your Books Help Save Lives...
Roscoe Pulliam

When the end of a full summer's day comes, there is a stilled hush, a benevolent sunset, and the quiet enveloping darkness of night. The heat of the day has subsided, and the night is well received. Yet we remember the work of the day, the sun's brilliant glow, and the full richness that comes with a deep experience in living. It is just so that we will remember the man. It is just so that he would wish to be remembered.

And we will remember. There will be the empty chair on the platform in chapel when the warming bell sets to grumbling confusion. There will be no brick dispersion with routine matters to make time for the sharing of a favorite joke introduced with a grin of anticipation. There will be no bits of loved poetry interspersed in the informal talks of chapel which made him at once a president, a counselor, and a friend. There will be no dark coated figure with a hat pulled over his ears plunging about the campus to keep his finger on every vein of the school of which he was so much a part. There will be none of these things—but we will remember.

There is something in greatness that reaches out to touch an answering chord in the remotest parts with which it comes in contact. That greatness was his. The door of his office was never locked to the student who wanted to reach him. It was for his ability, his influence, or opportunity, or to any worthy cause. "He who loses his life shall gain it" is wholly true of this man who did not hesitate to give all—and who in giving, has gained.

Dreams of a great university which were so real and alive to him are now alive only in the whiteness of paper and the blackness of ink. The dynamic leadership that conceived and germinated those dreams is gone. It is for us who believe to catch the falling torch, renew its life, and thrust it aloft again. With the inspiration and the memory of the man, the torch can not, and will not die. We will fight as he fought; we shall endure as he endured. WE WILL NOT FAIL.
