Group Living Experiment Proves Success

Eighty-four college bachelors have abandoned their footlockers and have happily tied themselves down in their dormitory rooms and set about keeping house in eight-room apartments.

"We used to come around town looking for a good meal," says one of the draftees, "and now we make our own." The bachelors have organized a kitchen, bought provisions, and set about keeping house.

A section of the Guardian house, for example, has been turned over to the bachelors, who have purchased a refrigerator and a stove.

The experiment began on the 52nd floor.

The modern, six to a room apartment, is a model of efficiency. The bachelors have over 90 per cent of the work.

"Southern cooked the idea of the apartment," says a resident, "You have to keep up each other's way." The bachelors have over 90 per cent of the work.

"I never thought," continues a resident, "that I would be able to cook just as well as any man in the country.

"The bachelors are all from different parts of the country, and they have all been cooking for themselves.

The experiment is proving a success for the bachelors who have come from all parts of the country.

An invited speaker at the Woman's Council meeting Thursday evening might have been particularly accurate.

As the meeting started, the presenter indicated that the presentation he was about to make was the first of its kind, and that he was not sure whether the audience would like it.

"It is difficult to explain what might have happened," said the presenter, "but I think that the "climactic" events in the life of the bachelors have only just begun.
