COLUMBIA U. HAS "ARTIFICIAL SUN"

An "artificial sun" is said to have been used in the tropical house of the University of Columbia, New York, for the past three years. The "artificial sun" is a large disk of glass, with a black surface on one side, and a white surface on the other. The black surface is heated by a strong electric current, and the white surface is cooled by a strong current of air. The result is a very intense and concentrated light, which can be used to simulate the sun's rays in a laboratory or greenhouse.
