American Journalists Sensationalize
Says: Chinese Journalist, SIU Student

by Larry Hogue

“Are journalists born or made? Do they make their marks by leading a life in journalism, or do they come into journalism with an inherent talent?”

Hogue observed that this question, in both the United States and the former Soviet Union, has been discussed quite extensively.

“My point of view is that journalists are born with the ability to tell stories, and this ability can be developed through practice and training,” Hogue said.

Hogue cited examples of journalists who have made significant contributions to the field, such as Carl Sandburg and Ida Tarbell.

Hogue argued that the role of the journalist is to inform the public and hold those in power accountable.

Hogue ended his talk by encouraging students to pursue a career in journalism and reminding them of the importance of critical thinking and ethical behavior in the field.

“I hope that this talk has inspired you to consider a career in journalism and that you will continue to question and challenge the information you encounter,” Hogue said.
