All But The Outside

Personal appeal and first impressions aren't everything, but they are important. Likewise, the general appearance of a building and the impression it makes on one's first contact are of utmost importance. The outward appearance of the Student Union is one of the things that students consider when they first enter the college. It's the first impression a visitor gets when entering the college. It's the first thing that strikes the eye when entering the Student Union.

The present Student Union building showing how the building looks from the outside.

The real problem in dressing up the outside of the new Student Union is that the present exterior finish does not take well to alteration, and the change of a material other than the present covering would be costly.

Similarly, the same problem will always be present in the case of a Student Union, one that is under construction or planned and marketed, and which is usually built with a view to accommodating women's houses with respect to the exterior appearance, the Student Union, as a whole will undoubtedly present the best aspect of anything which is decorated.

An Example

In the last issue of the Egyptian on an article comparing the architectural styles of the Christian Foundation hall and the Student Union, the writer questioned the similarity of the two buildings. While there is a certain resemblance, the two buildings are quite different in design and execution. The Christian Foundation hall is a classic example of the Neoclassical style, while the Student Union is a modern expression of the International style. The Christian Foundation hall is characterized by its symmetrical design, ordered proportions, and the use of classical elements such as columns and pediments. The Student Union, on the other hand, is a more dynamic and expressive structure, with its bold forms, modern materials, and the use of color and light to create a sense of movement and excitement.

The differences between the two buildings are also evident in their functional aspects. The Christian Foundation hall is primarily a place for education and learning, with its large lecture halls and classrooms. The Student Union, on the other hand, is a place for socializing and leisure, with its large common areas and recreational facilities.

Even though there are similarities between the two buildings, it is clear that they are very different in their design and execution, and that they serve different functions. The two buildings are not identical, but they are both valuable contributions to the architectural landscape of the campus.

World News in Brief

AT HARVARD UNIVERSITY—Two students of the History Department were admitted to the American Historical Association at the National Meeting of the Society of American Historians. The two students are considered to be among the most promising young historians in the United States. They have been selected for membership on the basis of their academic achievements and their potential for future contributions to the field of history.
