Quartet

One is always hit hard by the death of a friend, even if it is a fairly common occurrence in an old country church predominantly made up of old people. This death hit me particularly hard though. You see, in addition to grief over the recent loss of a dear friend, Byford Newton, and the normal empathy with the grieving family, this death carried a greater significance for me; it drove home the fact that my own grandfather too is mortal. I have to face the fact that one day, quite possibly very soon, I am going to lose him.

My grandpa was a member of an unofficial quartet of old-timers who habitually sat on the back row of the Mt. Hebron Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Est. 1865. I say "was" because the group no longer exists; it's just Grandpa now. No one could have sat by and watched how this close-knit group slowly dwindled to one without feeling, overwhelmingly, her own, and everyone else's mortality. Imagine how the lone member must feel. I have grieved with two widows; and yet, on the somber occasion of this third death, I feel guilt for I also selfishly grieve for myself. The sight of my grandpa on the back bench of our church, isolated, the empty spaces around him gradually being adapted to and filled in by younger people is almost more than I can bear. He hears a silent whisper, "I'm next." I know it; I feel it; I hear it too.

I remember all three of Grandpa's old buddies, Dick, Carl, and Byford, although it has been awhile since the first of them, Dick, passed away. I try really hard to remember the quaint details of each of them because not that many young people knew them who weren't related to them, and because old-timers are a dying breed. I don't think anyone can argue that this isn't conceptually true, but the saddest part is their irreplaceability.

Dick was a tiny, mostly bald man, with an even tinier little wife named Jewel. Dick's real name was Hershel, but the only one who ever called him that was Jewel. She had a way of saying his name that was piercing when she was aggravated at him, although this was seldom. Usually she was busy making him the homemade raisin pies that are now so famous at the Mt. Hebron Homecoming, held the fourth Sunday, every May. I've heard that when he was a young man, despite his small size, Dick could eat a whole raisin pie, by himself, after Sunday dinner. Now that he's gone, as she did mostly when he was alive, she has a way of saying his name that gives it unspeakable dignity, yet at the same time, she savors his name as she says it, like its owner used to savor her famous raisin pie.

They were truly inseparable in a way unlike any other couple I've ever known, at least after the particular couple got past the I'm-your-little-love-pup stage. This inseparability lasted throughout a lifetime.

Jewel didn't get a driver's license until her late sixties, and then only with strong urging from children, friends, and neighbors. I don't think Dick ever did push her to get it.
She didn't really need it because he always took her to town whenever she wanted to go. Unlike some of the country wives I know, she didn't look at a weekly trip to the beauty shop as an escape from farm, husband, and boredom; she did her own hair, and when she went to town Dick was always with her. From what I have heard, it was always that way between them. More than once, my grandma has told me about when she and Grandpa first moved here, and knew no one, about her amazement at seeing Dick and Jewel riding down the road, side by side, in a wagon drawn by a team, on their way to pick corn in their little corn patch. Like everyone else did then, they pulled it by hand; unlike everyone else, if Dick went to pull corn, Jewel went to pull corn, not because Dick needed the extra pair of hands, but because she wanted to be with him, even if it was in an itchy, buggy, weedy old corn patch.

Dick always had horses, always loved horses, horses and dogs. Every year, he and Jewel went to the harness races at the Union County Fair in Anna. They went just about every afternoon the horses ran. Jewel always said it was their vacation. At least once a year, he'd hook up his team to the wagon and take Jewel, kids, and grandkids on a ride to Panther's Den. Tinker generally went too. He was their dog. I always thought Tinker was the perfect dog for Dick because he was a perfect color match for the farm buildings Dick took care of for this man from Chicago who has land and holdings down here. That was Dick's job, taking care of Mr. Kentz's stuff. Anyway, most of Mr. Kentz's buildings are painted dull gold and chocolate brown, so Tinker, white with gold and chocolate markings, looked great running around checking on things with Dick. After Dick died, Tinker just vanished, I never did hear what happened to him.

Dick's familiar church attire was overalls and a big gold pocket watch with a chain on it. His watch complimented his one gold tooth which gleamed out from among his other slightly tobacco-stained teeth quite nicely. He had a gravelly voice that was completely disarming because of the way it unexpectedly boomed out of such a small amn. His voice fit his personality though. He was a jovial man, and the proud owner of the famous Wayside sign to boot. He was as flagrant about his pride in Wayside as he was about everything else, so naturally he owned such a sign and such a voice. He was a socializer, and some say a bit of a flirt, but I never could see flirting with someone so loud, and that was really before my flirting time anyway. He was so tanned that you couldn't even say his face looked leathery because it was almost too dark. It had lots of pliable-looking folds and wrinkles too, not at all taut and smooth and stiff, as I think of leather being. His darkness created another shocking physical contrast, other than his size compared to his voice. His complexion made his suprisingly light gray eyes sparkle and flash like tinted quartz. Only the top of his head, usually covered by a cap, except in church, was lighter in color. It had freckles on it too. Now on any other man, one probably wouldn't notice, but since Dick was so short, I became aware of this fact in the sixth grade when I shot up to 5'5.

He, like most of the other people in our church, had his customary seat. He always sat on the back row, by the window facing the road, so he could see the various vehicles, tractors and implements, pleasure riders, three-wheelers, backpackers, or tally-ho fox hunters and dogs that may pass by our church on any given Sunday. It was his custom to take at least one break from church, however, to sit on the porch outside, in the shade of the huge, ancient hickory growing by the cemetery fence and shading the gigantic bell that once was rung every Sunday, before it was invaded by wasps and someone stole the clanger, not in that order.
Anyway, Dick took these little breaks to sit on the porch and roll a cigarette from a can of Prince Albert or Velvet, usually Prince Albert. He tried to show me how to roll one once, when I had left church to visit the outhouse, and sat down to chat before I went back. *
Mine just didn't look like his though, and was hardly smokable.
Whenever I'd slip away from home, down the gravel road and up the hill to Dick and Jewel's, usually hoping for a piece of raisin pie, Dick could usually find time to hang around and talk, if he wasn't already at work. Jewel would sit in their porch swing, and he and I would sit on the gray wooden planks of the porch, talking of horses and dogs, cows and such. I still remember pulling my first pocket knife out of my overalls pocket to show it to him. He didn't laugh at the rounded tip, ground down by my grandpa, like a lot of others did. Unfortunately, my grandpa had forgotten that I knew right where the whetstone was located and exactly how to use it from following him around so much. It wasn't much of a knife, but I had sharpened 'er up pretty good. When Dick asked me if it was sharp, I ran my finger testingly over the blade, as I'd seen Grandpa do, but unfortunately, I'd forgotten that he'd ran his thumb over the blade cross-wise, not length-wise. There was a lot of difference between Grandpa's hard fingers and mine anyway, so not surprisingly, I got cut, but Dick never told on me. He showed me how to test it without getting hurt. I've never forgotten that incident. It was a shock to us all when during a nap on the couch, he died so unexpectedly in his sleep.

Carl was the next to leave the group. He was quite a character, one of the few republicans my family ever truly embraced. He was a dirty old man, but that statement is too blunt to express the tenderness of that phrase in this case. He was an old flirt, a delight, and he enjoyed his old age quite thoroughly. I never thought about him as much as Dick. I was really closer to Carl, but it hurt too much to think of my old friend when I still had to sit on the back pew at church, alone, with no ally to help disrupt or distract the little kids. I don’t think I’ve disrupted a service since we lost Carl, somehow it just wasn’t much fun without him.

And Byford. Grief is pretty fresh to try to think of him too much. He was the most reserved member of the bunch, although none of them were really very reserved. I didn’t get a chance to know him as well as Dick and Carl, because unlike them, he wasn’t my neighbor. I remember his courage and good humor when he had to have his leg amputated though. He got an artificial one, a three-wheeler to check his cows, some tennis shoes in place of his customary work boots (he had nice, clean Nikes for Sunday), and had some special equipment put in his truck. Afterwards, unless someone told you, you’d never have known anything he’d endured and still endured. He was always so cheerful. He’d greet me at church with a handshake and a "How art thou?" When I replied and asked him how he was doing, he’d make some sunny, humorous remark like, "Oh, I’m still hoppin’ around."

During the Sunday morning "specials," he continued to tap his feet with Grandpa on the back row, although the music they made with their feet was only a shadow of the wonderful rhythms executed when all four members of the quartet were alive and someone would sing something like Dick's old favorite, "Touring That City." Byford himself often played specials on his harmonica, or harp as he always called it.

His widow, Verla, is a lovely woman who has a chubby face that looks as if it were made from bread dough that had risen slightly, and her hair has a beautiful, totally becoming, blue-rinse tinge to it. Now Byford was a big storyteller, and I still can remember a story about he and Verla that somehow always seemed to get told at Homecoming each year. Byford, although not as little as Dick, was a small man, and Verla was a lot bigger than he was. Byford was quick though. They were out in the garden one day, and she got mad at him and threatened him with the hoe. He took off running and she chased him with that hoe. Someone always asked, "Well Byford, do you think she really would have hit you with it?" to which he replied, "Course she woulda. She was madder'n hops." Byford was quaint and spry as I've found so many people from the old school to be. I feel really sorry for all the young people who can't see beyond graying hair, wrinkled skin, and overly large ears and noses.

I have searched for solace in my old friend Carl, wonderful dirty old man that he was, and probably still is. I can see him flirting with golden-haired angels, asking them if the mini-robe is ever in fashion up there. Even in death, he still has the gift he brought others in life, to make them laugh and forget their troubles for awhile, even when the laughter is tinged with the pain of remembered loss. As I said before, I tried to avoid thinking of Carl until recently, but perhaps it is good that I did save such charming, distracting thoughts for a time when distraction is welcome.

Carl. He had a hee-hee-hee laugh that was a reflection of his jolly disposition. He loved young ladies; yet his enjoyment of our company, of talking with us and flirting with us and looking at us, never dimmed his deep love for his wife or his family. I am quite certain of that. It's a shame his children couldn't have been (they worried constantly over his antics); he was; we ladies were; I think even God was. Every girl was a granddaughter of sorts to Carl, in an endearing, lecherous kind of way. I'm sure he's chuckling down at me right now, trying to catch him on paper, glad to be any help, as he always was (as if I could hope to capture a leprechaun by drawing a line around him).

He was always so supportive, and he bought me wind-up, musical teddy bears after everyone else thought I'd outgrown them.

After he retired from his government job at the rest stop on Interstate 57, Carl began to take a long walk every morning and then would proceed to the Longhorn for coffee, gossip, and flirtation. He timed these morning walks to coincide with my flight along that road to school. No matter how late I was, and this was a regular occurrence, I almost always stopped to talk to Carl and stock up on Bubble Yum and sugarfree, spearmint Cents. He kept me and the rest of the softball team supplied with a stock pile of Bubble Yum. My grandma warned me, "Don't stop and talk to him. I don't think he has clean thoughts." I knew he had slightly soiled thoughts, but it didn't bother me much. I just didn't tell her I stopped.
The supply of gum he kept in his glove compartment was like the Biblical woman's supply of meal; she scraped the bottom of her barrel, but never ran out. I never knew him not to have a pack of gum, quite often one of those plastic ten-packs, for any child he met. I still have the last pack of gum he gave me, although oddly enough it is Doublemint instead of Bubble Yum. I keep it in a jar in my bedroom. Sometimes I open it and the evocative scent of Doublemint drifts out, bringing to mind a vivid picture of my old friend. He reminded me of a big pet pig in a way—large, round belly; little, skinny, white legs; a pink face with a round chin, backed up by a double- or maybe a triple-chin; heavy jowls; a steel-gray, butch haircut; and small, good humored, but slightly wicked eyes, pudgily set into his round face.

He was quite the patriot. He fought in World War II, like my grandpa, and was proud of it. After his retirement, he had a full-sized flag pole erected in his front yard, and could be found there most evenings, sitting under it, trying the dubious strength of a rickety lawn chair, with the little terriers he raised bouncing around him. Many times I have thoroughly dusted him as I, forever late, took that shifty curve in front of his house. He always smiled and waved expansively with his cigar, as I took my eyes from the unstable gravel long enough to honk and wave briefly.

He was a special breed, even for the old school. He never took offense when I lovingly called him a dirty old man. He always grinned; he knew it was true. I know Dick and Byford are in heaven. I'm sure Carl's there too, most likely happily tormenting prim angels at this moment. I'm certain that God has His special place in Heaven for such a special kind of dirty old man.

He died while I was on a 4-H trip to Washington, D.C. The flag I brought back now flies in his front yard. He sent me off with numerous packs of Bubble Yum and a whiskery kiss from a mouth dotted with scattered flakes of cigar tobacco. Sometimes, while driving out to the old high school, I see in my rear view mirror, a cackling, dirty old man, walking the road in the morning light, waving to me expansively with his walking stick raised high in the air in one hand and his cigar raised in the other. I miss those impudent cigar ashes, long swept from the old hardwood floors of Mt. Hebron Church.
The Mayor of Wayside

They took you back to the hospital today; Recurrent dread nibbles at my stomach wall.
Joints grow stiffer as age claims another fragment of flesh. Our chair springs sag to the carpeting,

Weary as your bones of hefting awkward bulk.
When I’m cross, you cry like a rain-soaked willow.
At these times, I remember toting water to fat sows in Holly Hobby sand buckets,

And recall your strong smell in your overalls and your bedroom.
Again I lie on your pliers, lost in the couch cushions; I step on your scattered toothpicks with bare feet, or get one from the holder that is flavored with earwax.

I feel the cooling of saliva-wet Camel tobacco on wasp stings from angry fall nappers, wakened by the Sunday firing of the church furnace, feel the weight of pocket knives, ground to a safe, rounded tip, once faithfully carried in my Osh Koshes.

I envision my jar of antique marbles, found one-by-one, as you tilled our garden, once an old coal dump.
I think of wild, fighting dreams of World War II, and you sleep-singing "I’ll Fly Away" some nights.

I inherited your itchy back, but not your rigid, labor-curled fingers that would scratch my back ‘til it burned, and balance you against the doorframe as you rubbed yours cow-style.

It took you years to teach me to whistle, but you can never remember to empty pockets full of fence staples, left for Mom’s washer, never had tolerance for the bright town teeth that would end up outlined on your Sunday shirt’s front pocket, or forgotten on a fence post in the Wayside cold.

I remember how those scrawny legs under that pot-belly have stomped as you haracked into the bathroom to lean dirty hands on a dirty wall-spot and pee like a mule, waking the whole house up.

Hunting Season in Wayside

The big he-man hunter is going out to club a fawn to feed his family, Only his family has a deep-freezer full of t.v. dinners and Lean Cuisine.
When I run over a rabbit, I cry; Yet I laugh at an image of you, blue hands and feet tied together over a pole, camouflage clothes dark-stained with your own blood, streaming from a slit throat, Swaying as you’re carried heavy from home, Vacation place for pampered trespassers who take you as their vacation trophy, to stare with glassy eyes at spoiled children from a family room wall. If you’re lucky, you may sometimes smell of Endust. If not, it’s attic mothballs and the weight of mouse bits in your open, taxidermied mouth.

Amy Perry
Hurdler

Arms extended,
Poised to leap,
Hands turned up at your wrists, Pads of fingers
Meeting base of palm.
Eyes of heart,
Cheekbones slant,
Show you were bred
To slice through thick wind.
One leg drawn back
Like a bowstring,
One suspended in front of you.
The flat of your foot in my face, As if you'd burst your boundaries And impale my adoring eyes on sharp spikes, Grinding the smell
Of track-worn rubber in my nose.

Two Oppossums

They were still cool and looked asleep. The sun hadn't yet heated the pavement. I looked back in my mirror, saw fur move slightly in my passing breeze.

One lay near a water puddle, she'd come like a child, looking for a drink in the night. Her worried lover found wet grief, and the common, blinding lights of a quick death.

Two oppossums died on the highway, not more than a yard apart, Pyramus and Thisbe of Route 37, blacktop Romeo and Juliet.

Amy Perry
Sideshow

Two fat women with moustaches lean against the corrugated tin of a temporary building on the midway, showing tobacco-stained teeth, worn nearly to nubs.

The narrow shiny pig-eyes and scratch red, gilded patches that spread like poison ivy between rolls of fat, under heavy breasts.
They rubbed the blotches with elderberry leaves, but it doesn’t help.

Tomorrow, they’ll watch their men, tanned and thin, load equipment into the old semi’s. They’ll all move on to the next town, mindless of the creaking of the ferris wheel, the paint chipping from the carousel that the children love.

Amy Perry
Night Thoughts

My pulse seems to scratch the pillowcase as it beats out my ear. In the East Woods, I hear the tormented baying of blueticks who are destined to forever chase their prey, but never eat it. I'm conscious of all the places in my body where I can feel my heart beat.
I want to unbutton my father's old shirt and spread it between my thumb and fingers, letting you lick the place between my breasts that feels so private and perfect when I touch it through the shirt with the backs of my fingers, having no thoughts of what lovers do when they're too old to make love in cars anymore.

Chicken Coop

Caligula and Tiberius companionably masturbate in a corner of the palace over ancient Egyptian porno scrolls.

Like an old rooster, Tiberius admires his own feathers, ragged and separating, but others see crusty feet, bloody spurs.

He doesn’t realize that Caligula, the scrawny-headed, cross-bred banty, is waiting to jump his molty back, grab him by a scabby, faded comb, and yank the feathers from his head, as if he were merely a spring hen.

Tiberius gloats, thinking of how he’ll leave Caligula for Rome like a wad of phlegm, hacked from the throat of an old man, and spewed onto the May grass.

Discovery

in a state of suspended animation, I retreat into the inversion of my thoughts, Tentatively tasting each before slowly,
carefully, parring my lips to let the thought drip off their wet edges.
I watch you swallow.
The swelling of your throat reminds me of how my body swells
when I'm with you.
The bump in your throat is fleeting,
fragile.
Is it so unlike when you were inside me, and I slid my hand down low on my abdomen to feel you there through my skin?
Amazed, I reached for your hand, guided it to where mine had been, let you share my discovery, as we shared our bodies on the carpeted floor.

Amy Perry
Tomboy

I remember the sour smell of the feedmill, powdery in my nose, And the hollow pat of my bare feet on the scarred wooden floor, a soft echo of Grandpa's heavy workboots.

My short legs couldn't keep up with him; I had to run to recapture the comforting rhythm, But my cap was loosened from my forehead, leaving my secret braids to tumble to the faded hip pockets of my Osh Koshes.

Male laughter floated heavily around me. Gleaming in the sunlight flooding the openness of P&S Grain, my braids gave me away, as the feed dust settled slowly around me.

Amy Perry
The ambulance took Matthew away in the afternoon. That night, I left with PawPaw and MawMaw in their pick-up, but we went back to get Elizabeth.

Her hair had been washed until the plastic strands matted, making her ponytail a permanent fixture on the top of her head, even when it wasn’t held by a band or ribbon.

Her cloth body lumpy and stained, her plastic arms and legs discolored, bruised like Matthew, she held her head proudly somehow, despite its infant-like wobbling caused not by youth, but by age.

I tried to make up for sticking a pencil in her mouth in place of a lost baby bottle by painting on lipstick, but the pink nail polish wasn’t lipstick. The crooked smear I made couldn’t cover the graphite stains inside the edges of her pursed, plastic lips.

Half the lashes are missing from one open-and-close eye, lending her the look of a half-winking accomplice. But they say I’m the one who scribbled black marker bruises on her butt. I don’t remember doing it, don’t remember a reason for it.

I wish I could have kept her pretty and perfect, undefaced, unmarked, like a porcelain collectible. But plastic dolls can’t live in safe, glass houses.

Amy Perry
Drunkenly, we rounded the curve, topped the hill. I saw the stone walls and the red geraniums of Makanda Cemetery.
I hadn’t been there in three years, not since the Memorial Day I cried and heard the whispers of the two widows who’d come to put silk flowers in the vases of their husbands. They spoke of newspaper articles and the custody battle—caused by a woman too scared to leave the man who’d killed her son.

But that day, the cemetery was empty and I told Troy to stop the car.
I walked to the gray baby stone with the teddy bear and the banner that says, “We miss you,” the one I’d chosen at the age of three.
I was ashamed of my drunkenness and the length of my absence. Mostly though, I was ashamed of the flowers, the solitary basket hanging from rusty iron, its contents faded to the color of mud.
The ravelings from the petals blew in the wind like weeds in an abandoned garden.

Thomas

Tonight I lay my head on your belly, Lightly, for many times in the past I have held your paw in my hand, fingered bird-fragile bones, and shuddered at the thought of cars crushing something so soft.
I lay my head, but lightly, on the softness of your side, knowing that underneath are organs, making you animate. Listening to your stomach function, I closed my eyes against long winter hairs, tangling with eyelashes.

Amy Perry
From Wayside to Marion

I'm kept from speeding up I-57 by two fifty-dollar tickets in as many months; both times I was coming to meet you.

The one in July. That was the day we hopped the fence to the McKinney Chapel Private Beach, but it was occupied.
We hid in a cove. You couldn't swim for shit; your long legs tangled in the lake-weed. I had to pull you in; you said I saved you and I laughed as the water dripped from our shivering bodies.

After that, you lost all motivation to swim.
We sat in the waist-deep water, on the radish-sized rocks, I sitting between your legs, leaning back on your chest, my fingers curled around the mound behind your bony knee, You tall enough to bend over my shoulder, your stubbled face grazing my neck, disturbing wet, stuck hair as you looked at my wet breasts, unfamiliar in the unnaturally bright sunlight, balanced across your tanned, appraising fingers.

I remember how you lay your head back in the water as I held it off the bottom in my hands; I remember your hair, drifting under the water, curling around my spread fingers. like the tongue of a coaxing lover, a living earthworm in warm milk.

In August, I came to have it out with you, since you kept hanging up the phone.
The cop was unsympathetic.

It's September. I want to leave sixty-five at least two inches behind my red speedometer needle.

I thought the weigh station was closer.
My hands at* damp, my feet sockless and slick.
Worn tires Ka-dub over tar ridges on the highway.

Trying to coordinate my foot to the speed signs, I envy the uninhibited passing cars, the woman on the back of the blue motorcycle.

Amy Perry
I love the language you hear over pool tables.
The scotch on Norman's breath meets me before his greeting as he bums a smoke.

I follow him up the brass-railed stairs to the pool table. They're waiting for him to take his shot. Unhurried, he rubs the tip of a house cue carefully with blue chalk.

He bends over the green, legs spread, head low, cue held delicately parallel with the table in his rough hands. He's shooting solids, lines up carefully on the purple four-ball.

His jeans hang on him like a pair pulled from the dirty clothes pile.
He always wears the same jeans.
I burned his ass with a lighter one night, not knowing they were the only pair he had.

A Blues fan who jumped Dave last Saturday while we watched the 'Hawks game on satellite whistles, and it cuts my pounding head like the crack of the cue ball after it hurtles across the green to meet the object ball of a tight rack; someone breaks another game-- "Straight eight, Busch league rules, fifty-cents a game, but free 'til seven."

Amy Perry
We wake at one and make love again.
Afterwards, lying close together, close to sleep, I tell you I like the way you smell. You don't believe me.
I try to explain, but can't.
It's not sweat; it's too cold out in November, the room's too nice.
The sheets feel good; they're cool where we don't touch them.
Your murmurs before sleep are the same as the sounds you made when you were inside me, but softer.
The feel of the soft hair on your legs against mine makes me forget the room bill, that it's on my credit card.
Leaving Wayside

The sloshing of the waterlilies in the still pond sounded like my grandmother bathing.
The morocca voices of frogs mocked our work in the hot garden from the cool of the dank water.

Grandpa forced the iron blade of the antique push-plow through the damp soil, burying weeds sprouting around fledgling vegetables. His bowlegged stride left slanted workboot footprints and I walked like a duck to place my smaller bare feet in the prints he made.

Now Wayside is miles away.
The landlord doesn't allow pets.
When I take a walk in the rain, I smell damp parking lots and warm garbage dumpsters.
Dave complains that the yard stinks when it's wet because it smells like dirt.

Grandpa sleeps away the hours he used to spend maintaining the farm.
Grandma bought him a La-Z-Boy and new box springs because his body aches.
The laundry must be done every two days instead of once a week because he can't control his bladder.

Last week, he shut himself inside our car and couldn't get out, but the doors weren't locked. He couldn't find the handles, but we've had that car five years.
And every night he asks Grandma when I'll be home, although I've been gone for months, leaving only my workboots.
